C. Highlights of Interview with Teresa Haley, President of the Illinois NAACP, who spoke about false promises of equity and opportunity for community of color by marijuana legalization proponents – Kristy Miller, Director, Office of Drug Policy

At the conference Teresa Haley gave a brief overview regarding how between the years of 2014 and 2018, Illinois experienced a series of developments and efforts related to marijuana legalization, which included various opportunities and equity concerns.

In 2014, the state took a significant step by legalizing medical marijuana, offering patients access to this form of treatment. Two years later, in 2016, Illinois decriminalized the possession of less than 10 grams of marijuana, reducing the penalties associated with such possession.

In the subsequent years, the state saw attempts to fully legalize recreational marijuana. In 2017, a legalization bill was filed, but it did not pass. The following year, in 2018, another legalization bill was filed, but it also did not pass. However, late in 2018, J.B. Pritzker secured victory in the governor's election with a platform that included the promise to legalize marijuana. This marked a turning point in the state's approach to marijuana policy. The momentum toward marijuana legalization continued in 2019 when a legalization bill was filed for the third time. Notably, the NAACP expressed opposition to this bill, characterizing legalization as "a form of modern-day slavery." This perspective shed light on the equity concerns surrounding marijuana legalization, particularly with regard to communities of color. During this period, Teresa emphasized the importance of educating youth, adults, people of color, and policymakers about the implications of marijuana legalization before it reached the legislature. This proactive approach aimed to ensure that all stakeholders were informed about the potential opportunities and challenges associated with the evolving marijuana policies in Illinois.

It was further shared that in the past, Illinois made significant strides in marijuana legalization for recreational use, with several noteworthy events and developments. The culmination of these efforts came when Governor Pritzker signed the historic legislation, making the announcement through a press release with the headline, "Gov. Pritzker Signs Most Equity-Centric Law in Nation to Legalize Adult-Use Cannabis." This groundbreaking law aimed to prioritize equity in the cannabis industry. However, as the media reported, the promises of an equitable marijuana industry in Illinois fell short of expectations. Headlines read, (1) "IL Marijuana Industry Was Supposed to Bring Equity. Advocates Say Promises Fall Short," (2) "How the 'Most Equity-Centric' Law on Weed Went Wrong – and Where IL Can Go from Here," and (3) "Despite Promises, IL Lacks Black-Owned Cannabis Dispensaries." These headlines highlighted the challenges and disparities that persisted despite the intention to create a more equitable cannabis market.

During this period, efforts to advance population-level policies to reduce substance misuse remained a significant focus. A major leadership role was held as a policy advisor to a global foundation dedicated to advancing such policies. One notable instance of advocacy during this time was the opposition to the Cannabis Administration & Opportunity Act (CAOA), a nationwide bill aimed at legalizing and commercializing marijuana. The concerns raised revolved around the potential public health and societal impacts of widespread commercialization. Additionally, the NBA was called out for allowing players to promote marijuana, as this was viewed as a potential danger to the health of young fans. The advocacy efforts sought to address the potential risks associated with normalizing marijuana use among athletes and its influence on younger audiences.
